CANYON TABLE

“I walked through ancient canyons where immense rivers, seas and oceans once lived.

The water has long gone, yet the stone remembers. Every ripple, every curve, every layer carved by millennia of patient current remains written on the rock, a silent memory of what once flowed.

This table was born from that memory.

I chose wood because it, too, is made of water. A tree spends its whole life drinking rain and rising toward the light, and its rings keep that story the way the canyon walls keep theirs. Two memories meet here: the stone that water shaped and the living matter that water raised.

I shaped it following the proportions nature uses to build everything that endures, guided by sacred geometry, the hidden order behind a shell, a wave, a riverbed.

I conceived its scale for the human body, so you never notice it. You simply feel at ease beside it, as if it had always been there.
Its surface holds the echo of water.

Touch it, and you will feel the ocean that once was.”
